

Diner en Blanc 1, Snarky Bloggers 0

by James Mulcahy

A dry Diner en Blanc, via Facebook

A lot of people are going to be returning a lot of transparent raincoats today. Despite dire warnings of rain, Parisian pop-up transplant Diner en Blanc managed to go down without becoming NYC's largest wet T-shirt contest. The organizers found 1,000 New Yorkers willing to pay $50 to lug their own tables the secret site (the World Financial Center Garden), along with their own food and booze despite the dire threat of rain.

Despite attendees going bonkers on the party's Facebook wall, the assurance that "it hasn't rained at a Diner en Blanc in over 20 years" turned out to be true (good thing, as no one really looks good in a transparent raincoat). We're not sure what kind of French hoodoo they pulled out, but by all accounts the dinner was a magical success (save for accidentally billing hundreds of people and a seating policy that was originally deemed anti-gay). Until next year!